Excerpt: . . . of dismounting on this occasion. Counsel admits that this manner of dismounting was all right if done in a level place, but insists that it is not the best way to alight when approaching an elevated object. Now in the absence of other evidence, can the court say that there is room for but one opinion or conclusion from the facts as to her want of due care in alighting, and that it is clearly manifest that her carelessness directly contributed to this injury I think, taking the evidence most favorable to defendants contention, the question is a debatable one, and if so it must be submitted to a jury.
